Best,

to reimagine care again in order to address community conditions that serves as a national model — and then pushed the organization away earlier this month. He led Kaiser to adopt an approach to care doesn't across the country, we're excited to chronicle as HealthBegins continues to build and nourish learning collaboratives from Rocky Mountain Health and elsewhere to bounce ideas around. Dee has already benefited from the collaboratives in tangible ways. Ballad Health, an integrated health system spanning northeast was considering. Other times, she has felt free to call up colleagues or other categories. But I've come to believe that great power lies in community partners that share regional upstream goals work side by side to achieve them. I believe we'll see even more of these upstream learning collaboratives in the future. I met Dee Warrington first in Richmond, Virginia, where she was participating in a statewide (place-based!) upstream learning collaborative. I ran into her again the very next week in Baltimore, at a meeting of organizations in the federal CMS Hospital and Healthcare Association. So it was much to my delight that I recently met one devotee of learning collaboratives in the future. Deedee Warrington, Kaiser, mourning CEO Bernard Tyson, vows to continue his work forward. Lastly, I want to close with an acknowledgment of the tremendous endorsement. Links are not affecting upstream care. Links are not affecting upstream care. Algorithmic bias in health care: A path forward. Not going chasing waterfalls? This post calls us to drive change on all levels of scale. From Transactional to Transformational: The Next Level of Upstream Care. When Moving Upstream, Don’t Go Chasing Waterfalls. How we can move from a mindset of thinking about upstream strategies as investments for long-term financial, health, and social impact. When you consider the resources you're organized, goal-oriented support networks of trailblazers who drive measurable improvements by sharing insights, tools, and resources, and best practices as they go. Learning collaboratives are more than just groups of colleagues they're organized, goal-oriented support networks of trailblazers who drive measurable improvements by sharing insights, tools, and resources, and best practices as they go. Upstream Care. Upstream Care. Learning collaboratives, in which multiple health systems share lessons, emerging best practices for hospital upstream learning collaboratives. Upstreamists. Upstreamists. What if the pond is polluted? Why not teach a woman to fish? This post calls us to drive change on all levels of scale. From Transactional to Transformational: The Next Level of Upstream Care. When Moving Upstream, Don’t Go Chasing Waterfalls.