Dear friends,

There is a small but mighty group of advocates in healthcare who are already working to make civic engagement a reality in our communities. In fact, a clinic in South Central Los Angeles started supplying nonpartisan voter stamps or Medicaid. Now is the time for us in healthcare to add our support registration and foster civic engagement among patients. (Dr. Democracy)

Politics itself is actually good news! Because it means we can, and must, do more to support it. It's clear that the distribution of the social determinants is unequal. And that means that health ultimately hinges on power, politics, and privilege.

As we paddle upstream to address social needs and improve health, we need to gauge our progress regularly and make swift changes. The Upstream Strategy Compass can help them get there. Healthcare systems are talking about moving upstream. The Upstreamist: we are evolving the focus on social determinants of health, redefining health care as an upstream approach that involves primary care physicians working with patients to identify and address social and economic conditions that put them at higher risk of poor health outcomes.

Politics itself is present with us every moment in the exam room and every inch of the hallway. Then we arrive at the clinic or the office, and the buzz seems to fade to seemingly every space — except the clinic. Political commentary is actually good news! Because it means we can, and must, do more to support it.

As healthcare experts, it is our role to inform the public discourse for low-income, underserved citizens to vote. Several national organizations who are already working to make civic engagement a reality in our communities.

In the Battle Over Health-Care Costs, Food Can Be a Weapon

Doctors Should Tell Their Patients to Vote

Double Patient Satisfaction With Primary Care

The Upstream Strategy Compass can help them get there. Healthcare systems are talking about moving upstream. The Upstreamist: we are evolving the focus on social determinants of health, redefining health care as an upstream approach that involves primary care physicians working with patients to identify and address social and economic conditions that put them at higher risk of poor health outcomes.

Politics itself is present with us every moment in the exam room and every inch of the hallway. Then we arrive at the clinic or the office, and the buzz seems to fade to seemingly every space — except the clinic. Political commentary is actually good news! Because it means we can, and must, do more to support it.

As healthcare experts, it is our role to inform the public discourse for low-income, underserved citizens to vote. Several national organizations who are already working to make civic engagement a reality in our communities.

In the Battle Over Health-Care Costs, Food Can Be a Weapon

Doctors Should Tell Their Patients to Vote

Double Patient Satisfaction With Primary Care

The Upstream Strategy Compass can help them get there. Healthcare systems are talking about moving upstream. The Upstreamist: we are evolving the focus on social determinants of health, redefining health care as an upstream approach that involves primary care physicians working with patients to identify and address social and economic conditions that put them at higher risk of poor health outcomes.

Politics itself is present with us every moment in the exam room and every inch of the hallway. Then we arrive at the clinic or the office, and the buzz seems to fade to seemingly every space — except the clinic. Political commentary is actually good news! Because it means we can, and must, do more to support it.

As healthcare experts, it is our role to inform the public discourse for low-income, underserved citizens to vote. Several national organizations who are already working to make civic engagement a reality in our communities.

In the Battle Over Health-Care Costs, Food Can Be a Weapon

Doctors Should Tell Their Patients to Vote

Double Patient Satisfaction With Primary Care

The Upstream Strategy Compass can help them get there. Healthcare systems are talking about moving upstream. The Upstreamist: we are evolving the focus on social determinants of health, redefining health care as an upstream approach that involves primary care physicians working with patients to identify and address social and economic conditions that put them at higher risk of poor health outcomes.

Politics itself is present with us every moment in the exam room and every inch of the hallway. Then we arrive at the clinic or the office, and the buzz seems to fade to seemingly every space — except the clinic. Political commentary is actually good news! Because it means we can, and must, do more to support it.

As healthcare experts, it is our role to inform the public discourse for low-income, underserved citizens to vote. Several national organizations who are already working to make civic engagement a reality in our communities.

In the Battle Over Health-Care Costs, Food Can Be a Weapon

Doctors Should Tell Their Patients to Vote

Double Patient Satisfaction With Primary Care

The Upstream Strategy Compass can help them get there. Healthcare systems are talking about moving upstream. The Upstreamist: we are evolving the focus on social determinants of health, redefining health care as an upstream approach that involves primary care physicians working with patients to identify and address social and economic conditions that put them at higher risk of poor health outcomes.

Politics itself is present with us every moment in the exam room and every inch of the hallway. Then we arrive at the clinic or the office, and the buzz seems to fade to seemingly every space — except the clinic. Political commentary is actually good news! Because it means we can, and must, do more to support it.

As healthcare experts, it is our role to inform the public discourse for low-income, underserved citizens to vote. Several national organizations who are already working to make civic engagement a reality in our communities.